book of this breadth could not have been researched, reported and written by one author working alone. By the time I finished the last chapter, events would have overtaken the forecasts I had written a year or two earlier.

So, much of the reporting and analysis came from my colleagues at Kiplinger, who cover these subjects for our weekly and biweekly reports on the business outlook. Their input was the starting point for my writing, and near the end of the job, they critiqued, challenged and helped me refine my forecasts. My use of the first-person plural—the editorial “we”—is not an author’s false modesty. It reflects the reality of our collegial reporting and forecasting process.

I tip my hat with great respect to the Kiplinger colleagues who assisted me on the first edition of World Boom Ahead: our longtime executive editor Jack Kiesner, who retired in mid ’99; editorial manager and foreign affairs editor Gary Matthews, who has since returned to U.S. diplomatic service in Bosnia; chief of research Annemarie Albaugh; editors Gini Barazia, Peter Blank, Melissa Bristow, Marty Chase, Martha Craver, Ken Dalecki, Mike Doan, Bill Eby, John Fogarty, Jerry Idaszak, Steve Ivins, Elizabeth Kelleher, Joan Pryde, and Mark Sfiligoj; and research reporters Romaine Bostick, Greg Luberecki, Gerry Moore, Jenny Morrison, and Amy Roberts. I am especially indebted to David Koenig, a former Kiplinger editor, for his timely and diligent help in organizing the staff’s work into some well-focused drafts.

Austin Kiplinger—my father, colleague and editor emeritus of our organization—provided astute judgment, inspiration and (most appreciated of all) editorial supervision of the weekly Kiplinger Letter during the final months of my writing and revision.

Every author needs a tough and caring editor, and I was very fortunate to have one in David Harrison, the director of Kiplinger Books. With candor and good humor, he kept the project on schedule, revived my spirits when they flagged, and made countless improvements in the content and presentation of my ideas. My executive assistant, Emily Melton, was the best scheduler, facilitator, gatekeeper and friend an author could have. Several other Kiplinger staffers contributed valuable assistance: Rosemary Beales Neff fine-tuned the manuscript; Daniel Kohan provided a clean design; Dianne Olsufka proofread the galleys; and Don Fragale smoothed the book's course through production and printing.

I reserve my deepest gratitude and affection for my family—my wife, Ann, my son, Brigham, my daughters, Sutton and Daphne—who gracefully endured Dad's preoccupation, distraction and occasional irascibility while he was working at home on "the book." (Although our beloved Kerry Blue terrier, Henry, cannot read this acknowledgment, I hope he can sense my gratitude for his comforting presence, lying nearby while I banged on the keyboard, paced back and forth and struggled for the right words.)

Finally, I want to acknowledge the contributions of our many editorial sources—the men and women in business, government, academe and research who give us the benefit of their judgment every week for our Kiplinger Letters. Some of our best sources are our subscribers, who suggest story ideas and contribute to our knowledge of their fields. It is they who are the real experts on what lies ahead. We journalists are simply the communicators of their knowledge, experience and foresight.
